Answer: A

NEW QUESTION: 2

Service A retrieves data from third-party services that reside outside the organizational boundary. The quality of the data provided by these third-party services is not guaranteed. Service A contains exception shielding logic that checks all outgoing messages. It is discovered that service consumers are still sometimes receiving malicious content from Service A. Because digital signatures are being used, it is confirmed that Service A is, in fact, the sender of these messages and that the messages are not being altered by any intermediaries. Why do messages from Service A continue to contain malicious content?

- A. Digital signatures alone are not sufficient. They need to be used in conjunction with asymmetric encryption in order to ensure that no intermediary can alter messages.
- B. Messages received from third-party services are the likely source of the malicious content.
- C. Exception shielding logic needs to be used in conjunction with asymmetric encryption in order to guarantee that malicious content is not spread to service consumers.
- D. None of the above.

Answer: B
