NEW QUESTION: 3

A company ingests and processes streaming market data. The data rate is constant. A nightly process that calculates aggregate statistics is run, and each execution takes about 4 hours to complete. The statistical analysis is not mission critical to the business, and previous data points are picked up on the next execution if a particular run fails.

The current architecture uses a pool of Amazon EC2 Reserved Instances with 1-year reservations running full time to ingest and store the streaming data in attached Amazon EBS volumes. On-Demand EC2 instances are launched each night to perform the nightly processing, accessing the stored data from NFS shares on the ingestion servers, and terminating the nightly processing servers when complete. The Reserved Instance reservations are expiring, and the company needs to determine whether to purchase new reservations or implement a new design. Which is the most cost-effective design?

- A. Update the ingestion process to use Amazon Kinesis Data Firehose to save data to Amazon Redshift. Use an AWS Lambda function scheduled to run nightly with Amazon CloudWatch Events to query Amazon Redshift to generate the daily statistics.

B. Update the ingestion process to use Amazon Kinesis Data Firehose to save data to Amazon S3.

Use a fleet of On-Demand EC2 instances that launches each night to perform the batch processing of the S3 data and terminates when the processing completes.

C. Update the ingestion process to use a fleet of EC2 Reserved Instances behind a Network Load Balancer with 3-year leases. Use Batch with Spot instances with a maximum bid of 50% of the On-Demand price for the nightly processing.

D. Update the ingestion process to use Amazon Kinesis Data Firehose to save data to Amazon S3.

Use AWS Batch to perform nightly processing with a Spot market bid of 50% of the On-Demand price.

Answer: D

Explanation:

A: On demand instances is more expensive.

B: Since the analysis is not mission critical and can be restarted, spot instances is cheaper.

C: EC2 is more expensive.

D: Compared to B Lambda should be cheaper to Batch using spot instances which ultimately still charges based on EC2 pricing. But critical thing is Lambda cannot go beyond 15 minutes of execution time. So it is more for simple processing and in this case it is not. It takes 4 hours.
